This Week in NYC

It's officially sweater weather in the Big Apple, but that shouldn't stop you from enjoying the many seasonal events around the city. This week, we bring you a collection of events to help you appreciate local architecture, a "space bubble" restaurant, and two cultural festivals.

Five-Borough Outdoor Scavenger Hunt

- » Open House New York and Archtober have organized a 36-hour, five-borough, outdoor scavenger hunt, where participants are challenged to decipher clues and submit photos of architectural relics, public art installations, and more. Registration closes Wednesday, October 15, and clues will be released on Saturday, October 17. Click here for more details.

First Peoples Week Closing Performance

- » First Peoples Week is an annual celebration of the life, history, and culture of North America's indigenous people. This year's closing event is a live performance by critically-acclaimed Choctaw Nation singer/songwriter Samantha Crain. The performance will stream live on Saturday, October 10 at 8 P.M.

Asian American International Film Festival

- » The Asian American International Film Festival is the longest-running film festival that specifically highlights filmmakers of Asian descent. Now through Sunday, October 11, there are over a dozen short and feature-length films, live Q&A sessions, and live roundtable events available to stream at home. Click here for a full schedule.

"Space Bubble" Dining at Café du Soleil

- » Café du Soleil, a trendy French bistro on the Upper West Side, has installed 18 geodesic domes for a unique outdoor dining experience. The restaurant's "space bubbles" can seat small parties and must be reserved online in advance. Make your reservation today.
